NEW QUESTION: 4

A company is deciding whether to purchase an automated machine to manufacture one of its products. Expected net cash flows from this decision depend on several factors, interactions among those factors, and the probabilities associated with different levels of those factors.

The method that the company should use to evaluate the distribution of net cash flows from this decision and changes in net cash flows resulting from changes in levels of various factors is:

- A. Simulation and sensitivity analysis.
- B. Differential analysis.
- C. Linear programming.
- D. Correlation analysis.

Answer: A

Explanation:

Simulation is a technique used to describe the behavior of a real-world system over time.

This technique usually employs a computer program to perform the simulation computations.

Sensitivity analysis examines how outcomes change as the model parameters change.
