NEW QUESTION: 1

A company needs to cost-effectively persist small data records (up to 1 KiB) for up to 30 days.

The data is read rarely. When reading the data, a 5-minute delay is acceptable.

Which of the following solutions achieve this goal? (Choose two.)

- A. Write the records to Amazon DynamoDB configured with a Time To Live (TTL) of 30 days. Read data using the GetItem or BatchGetItem call.
- B. Use Amazon S3 to collect multiple records in one S3 object. Use a lifecycle configuration to move data to Amazon Glacier immediately after write. Use expedited retrievals when reading the data.
- C. Write the records to an Amazon ElastiCache for Redis. Configure the Redis append-only file (AOF) persistence logs to write to Amazon S3. Recover from the log if the ElastiCache instance has failed.
- D. Write the records to Amazon Kinesis Data Firehose and configure Kinesis Data Firehose to deliver the data to Amazon S3 after 5 minutes. Set an expiration action at 30 days on the S3 bucket.
- E. Use an AWS Lambda function invoked via Amazon API Gateway to collect data for 5 minutes.

Write data to Amazon S3 just before the Lambda execution stops.

Answer: A,D

Explanation:

A: After 30 days the data should be deleted instead of storing it.

B: When an object reaches the end of its lifetime, Amazon S3 queues it for removal and removes it asynchronously. There may be a delay between the expiration date and the date at which Amazon S3 removes an object. You are not charged for storage time associated with an object that has expired.

C: Does not address the 30 days deletion.
