- B. True, from the application's point of view, connecting to the cluster configuration endpoint is no different than connecting directly to an individual cache node.
- C. False, you can connect to a cluster configuration endpoint, but not to a cache node.

D. True, from the application's point of view, connecting to the cluster configuration endpoint is no different than connecting directly to an individual cache node since, each has a unique node identifier.

Answer: B

Explanation:

This is true. From the application's point of view, connecting to the cluster configuration endpoint is no different than connecting directly to an individual cache node. In the process of connecting to cache nodes, the application resolves the configuration endpoint's DNS name. Because the configuration endpoint maintains CNAME entries for all of the cache nodes, the DNS name resolves to one of the nodes; the client can then connect to that node.
