Containers are a key component of cloud native architectures. They allow applications to be packaged and deployed consistently across different environments. This is achieved through the use of container engines like Docker and Kubernetes. These engines manage the lifecycle of containers, including their creation, execution, and termination. Containers provide isolation and resource management, ensuring that applications run reliably and efficiently. This is particularly important for multi-tenant environments where different applications share the same underlying hardware. The use of containers also simplifies the deployment and scaling of applications, making it easier to manage complex systems. In summary, containers are essential for modern cloud architectures, providing a flexible and scalable way to run applications.
