NEW QUESTION: 1

A customer requires a highly scalable SAN environment. Which SAN topology should be recommended?

- A. Full mesh
- B. Bridged
- C. Token ring
- D. Core-edge

Answer: D

Explanation:

Core-Edge Topology The core-edge fabric topology has two types of switch tiers. The edge tier is usually composed of switches and offers an inexpensive approach to adding more hosts in a fabric.

Each switch at the edge tier is attached to a switch at the core tier through ISLs. The core tier is usually composed of directors that ensure high fabric availability. In addition, typically all traffic must either traverse this tier or terminate at this tier. In this configuration, all storage devices are connected to the core tier, enabling host-to-storage traffic to traverse only one ISL. Hosts that require high performance may be connected directly to the core tier and consequently avoid ISL delays.

In core-edge topology, the edge-tier switches are not connected to each other. The core edge fabric topology increases connectivity within the SAN while conserving the overall port utilization. If fabric expansion is required, additional edge switches are connected to the core. The core of the fabric is also extended by adding more switches or directors at the core tier. Based on the number of core-tier switches, this topology has different variations, such as, single-core topology and dual-core topology. To transform a single core topology to dual core, new ISLs are created to connect each edge switch to the new core switch in the fabric.

How does AWS Data Pipeline execute activities on on-premise resources or AWS resources that you manage?

- A. By supplying a Task Runner file that the resources can access for execution
- B. By supplying a Task Runner package that can be installed on your on-premise hosts
- C. By supplying a Task Runner json script that can be installed on your on-premise hosts
- D. None of these

Answer: B

Explanation:

To enable running activities using on-premise resources, AWS Data Pipeline does the following:

It supply a Task Runner package that can be installed on your on-premise hosts.

This package continuously polls the AWS Data Pipeline service for work to perform.

When it's time to run a particular activity on your on-premise resources, it will issue the appropriate command to the Task Runner.
