WLAN networks can be designed in one of two configurations: single service set identifier (SSID) or dual SSID. Single SSID is considered the easiest to deploy and manage. This is because two SSIDs need to be managed for dual SSID.

The single SSID design model uses a secured SSID. Employees initially connect via open SSID; however, after provisioning they are redirected to the secured SSID.

The Cisco Identity Services Engine (ISE) and Cisco Wireless LAN Controller configurations may easily be changed to support either option. The unique requirements and preferences of an organization will dictate which model to deploy.
