NEW QUESTION: 2

The Orders database table uses Order_id as its primary key. You have written the following code to use in the Orders block of a form:

```
SELECT orders_seq.NEXTVAL
INTO :orders.order_id
FROM SYS.dual;

Which statement is true about this code?

- A. You should place this code in Pre-insert trigger to minimize the gaps in Order IDs.
- B. If the named sequence does not exist, it is automatically created the first time the code is called.
- C. You should place this code in a Post_insert trigger to minimize the gaps in Order IDs.
- D. If you place this code in a trigger, you should ensure that Order_Id has its Database Item property set to No.
- E. If you place this Code in a trigger that fires when the record is inserted into the database, you will likely have more gaps in Order IDs than if you use the sequence as a default value for the item.
- F. If you place this code in a trigger, you should ensure that Order_Id has its required property set to Yes.
- G. You should place this code a in a database trigger to minimize the gaps in Order IDs.

Assigning Sequence Numbers to Records

You will recall that you can assign default values for items from an Oracle sequence, to automatically provide unique keys for records on their creation. However, if the user does not complete a record, the assigned sequence number is "wasted." An alternative method is to assign unique keys to records from a Pre-Insert trigger, just before their insertion in the base table, by which time the user has completed the record and issued the Save.

Assigning unique keys in the posting phase can:

* Reduce gaps in the assigned numbers
 * Reduce data traffic on record creation, especially if records are discarded before saving Example
 This Pre-Insert trigger on the ORDERS block assigns an Order ID from the sequence ORDERS_SEQ, which will be written to the ORDER_ID column when the row is subsequently inserted.
 SELECT ORDERS_SEQ.nextval
 INTO :ORDERS.order_id
