NEW QUESTION: 3

A web application runs on Amazon EC2 instances and accesses external services. The external services require authentication credentials. The application is deployed using AWS CloudFormation to three separate environments: development, test, and production. Each environment requires unique credentials for external services.

What option securely provides the application with the needed credentials while requiring MINIMAL administrative overhead?

- A. Create a separate CloudFormation template for each environment. In the Resources section, include a user data script for each EC2 instance. Use the user data script to insert the proper credentials for the environment into the EC2 instances.
- B. Store the credentials as secure strings in AWS Systems Manager Parameter Store. Pass an environment tag as a parameter to the CloudFormation template. Use the user data script to insert the environment tag in the EC2 instances. Access the credentials from the application.
- C. Create separate Amazon Machine Images (AMIs) with the required credentials for each environment. Pass the environment tag as a parameter to the CloudFormation template. In the Mappings section of the CloudFormation template, map the environment tag to the proper AMI, then use that AMI when launching the EC2 instances.
- D. Pass the credentials for the target environment to the CloudFormation template as parameters. Use the user data script to insert the parameterized credentials into the EC2 instances.

Answer: B
