NEW QUESTION: 1

Pin, Password, Passphrases, Tokens, smart cards, and biometric devices are all items that can be used for Authentication. When one of these item listed above in conjunction with a second factor to validate authentication, it provides robust authentication of the individual by practicing which of the following?

- A. Discretionary authentication
- B. Multi-party authentication
- C. Two-factor authentication
- D. Mandatory authentication

Answer: C

Explanation:

Once an identity is established it must be authenticated. There exist numerous technologies and implementation of authentication methods however they almost all fall under three major areas.

There are three fundamental types of authentication:
Authentication by knowledge-something a person knows
Authentication by possession-something a person has

Authentication by characteristic-something a person is Logical controls related to these types are called "factors." Something you know can be a password or PIN, something you have can be a token fob or smart card, and something you are is usually some form of biometrics.

Single-factor authentication is the employment of one of these factors, two-factor authentication is using two of the three factors, and three-factor authentication is the combination of all three factors.

The general term for the use of more than one factor during authentication is multifactor authentication or strong authentication.
