NEW QUESTION: 1

Cisco .com requires that a network designer show proof of concept for a redesigned remote access solution that will be implemented in the Enterprise Edge functional area of an existing network. Budget and time constraints require testing in only a portion of the existing Remote Access module.

Which kind of test will be used to show proof of concept?

- A. None of the above
- B. Simulation
- C. Prototype
- D. Isolated
- E. Pilot

Answer: E

Explanation:

The last step in creating a successful design solution is demonstrating to the customer how your design solution meets that customer's needs for performance, security, capacity, and scalability.

Often the designs proposed are complex and have many different components that must be brought together to build a complete solution. Usually a more complex design means a greater cost to the customer. Therefore, it is important that the consultant provide sound proof to the customer that the proposed design will meet the customer's needs.

Two methods demonstrate to the customer how the proposed design will solve that customer's network needs. The first method is to build a prototype, which is used for large scale designs. The second is to construct a pilot, which is a smaller and less complicated version of the prototype that is ideal for smaller designs. In this example, a pilot would be more appropriate.
