NEW QUESTION: 3

Which of the following is less likely to be included in the change control sub-phase of the maintenance phase of a software product?

- A. Estimating the cost of the changes requested
- B. Determining the interface that is presented to the user
- C. Recreating and analyzing the problem
- D. Establishing the priorities of requests

Answer: B

Explanation:

Explanation/Reference:

Explanation:

To determine the user interface would not be part of the change control phase. This would be done in an earlier phase.

The change control analyst is responsible for approving or rejecting requests to make changes to the network, systems, or software. This role must make certain that the change will not introduce any vulnerability, that it has been properly tested, and that it is properly rolled out. The change control analyst needs to understand how various changes can affect security, interoperability, performance, and productivity.

Incorrect Answers:

A: Calculation the cost of the change should be a part of analyzing a change request.

B: Testing is a part of change control. If a problem occurs during testing change control should recreate and analyze the problem.

D: If there are multiple change requests then they must be prioritized in the change control phase.
