NEW QUESTION: 2

Which two statements are correct regarding configuring RAC and Data Guard for a Database Service (DBaaS) in OCI?

- A. RAC instances are configured to run across multiple Fault Domains.
- B. RAC instances should be configured to run in single Fault Domain.
- C. RAC instances should be configured to run in multiple regions.
- D. RAC instances are configured to run across multiple Availability domains.
- E. Data Guard can be implemented within or across Availability Domain.

Answer: A,E

Explanation:

Fault Domain: The fault domain(s) in which the DB system resides. You can choose which fault domain to use for your DB system. For 2-node RAC DB systems, you can specify which two fault domains are to be used. Oracle recommends that you place each node of a 2-node RAC DB system in a different fault domain. For more information on fault domains, see Fault Domains.

<https://docs.cloud.oracle.com/en-us/iaas/Content/Database/Tasks/creatingDBsystem.htm> Oracle recommends that the DB system that contains the standby database be in a different availability domain from that of the DB system containing the primary database to improve availability and disaster recovery. If you enable Oracle Data Guard for a database and your standby database is in the same availability domain as the primary database (either by choice, or because you are working in a single availability domain region), then Oracle recommends that you place the standby database in a different fault domain from that of the primary database.
